Revelation on

Anti Smoking groups admit to knowingly
MISLEADING the public/lawmakers about the

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

November 8, 2007

By: Dr. Michael Siegel (Boston University School of Public Health)

I have woken up today to a true nightmare -- the Wall Street Journal revealing that anti-smoking groups admit to knowingly deceiving the public in order to promote their policy goals.

The rest of the story is that it is now clear that anti-smoking groups are knowingly misleading the public in order to exaggerate the acute effects of secondhand smoke in an effort to promote widespread outdoor smoking bans.

We are not surprised at all. We have stated all along that the smoking bans were based on false information/lies given to lawmakers on the so called dangers of secondhand smoke! These "ethical" organizations should be held accountable for their fraudulent actions! This is a bombshell of a story that nobody is covering, outside the Journal.

While I always expected to read such revelations about the tobacco companies, I never expected to read the same thing about groups to which I have devoted years of my life in the service of providing sound scientific information to ensure that our communications to the public are honest, accurate, and dependable.

And to add insult to injury, the anti-smoking movement is now aware of this and they are defending it. There seems to be no hope that they will take note of the inappropriate actions and correct them in the future.

I never received a membership card when I joined the anti-smoking movement, but if I had, today is the day I'd be sending it back. These are not the ethical standards with which I would like to be associated.
